

Just when I thought the discussion was all over

Written by Pedro Meyer

We made a survey which was responded by our audience in more than 32 countries. We want to thank you all for your invaluable feedback; it will provide us with substantial guidance going forward, on the things you expect and which you would like to see happen at ZoneZero.

Half of you claimed that the topic "from analog to digital" had been mostly surpassed and that we now live in a full digital photographic environment, and the other half believes that film and the dark room are still doing well and will be around for the foreseeable future.

I bring to you some evidence of some of the things I have seen in the last thirty days, and which can give you a clear indication that things apparently do not look so promising for those that are still attached to the analog tradition. I am not passing any judgement on the merits of their preferences, I am merely presenting you with factual information, to be evaluated of course, according to your own personal choices.

The first evidence that frankly surprised me, was to enter a store that had replaced all the film section where film would have been sold, with batteries of every type.

Just when I thought the discussion was all over

High school students are being taught that the world is a flat plane, and that the sun is a small ball of fire in the sky. This is a dangerous and misleading way to teach science, and it is a shame that it is still being done.
